Summary Statement

My primary interests are in identity, broadly defined (including personal, ethnic, and cultural identity) and in parental involvement and family functioning. My interests in personal identity include developing and refining models of modeling to be applicable and consistent across ethnic groups; establishing linkages between and among different conceptions of identity that have been studied separately; and mapping the relationships of identity and contextual processes to public health concerns such as substance use and HIV risk behaviors. I am also interested in intrinsic motivation, self-concordance, and the authentic self, and the ways in which being true to oneself is associated with positive well-being and protective against health risk behaviors.

My interests in ethnic and cultural identity include extending the study of cultural processes to include White Americans as well as members of other ethnic groups; the relationships between cultural processes and psychosocial functioning; and the effects of cultural processes and identity on positive and negative developmental outcomes.

My interests in parental involvement include the structure of mothering and fathering, the domains in which divorce affects parental involvement, and the effects of parental involvement (and non-involvement) on youth outcomes. I am also interested in the consistency of associations between parental involvement and youth outcomes across gender and ethnicity.

I also have a strong interest in developing integrative theoretical models of human development. In my theoretical work, I have advocated integrating various theories and models of identity, considering self and context as predictors of positive and negative mental and physical health outcomes, and examining the consistency of theoretical and empirical models across ethnicity. I am the senior editor of the forthcoming Handbook of Identity Theory and Research, to be published in early 2011.

In addition to these core interests, I have also done a fair amount of consultation. Because I am both a writer and a methodologist, colleagues often approach me for help with their papers – and I am glad to make whatever contribution I can. I have 35 peer-reviewed journal articles on which my primary role was as a consultant.

Education

- 2000-2001 Post-Doctoral Training, Center for Treatment Research on Adolescent Drug Abuse, University of Miami Medical School, Miami, FL.
